

In Special Tribute Howard S. McDonald

President 1949-1962

Howard Stevenson McDonald died on October 25, 1986. He was 92 years of age.

Dr. McDonald was an educator all of his life, serving as a coach, teacher, and administrator in the public schools and as a university and college president. His other great interest was his devoted service throughout his life to the Church of Jesus Christ Of Latter-Day Saints.

When Dr. McDonald arrived in the summer of 1949 to assume the presidency of Los Angeles State College, and to serve also as the head of Los Angeles City (Junior) College, he found a fledgling state college

CELEBRATE EMERITI WEEK

Retired Faculty Will Be Honored During Week of February 9 to 13

The fourth annual Emeriti Week celebration, when the faculty and administration of the University pay special tribute to the 270 retired members of the faculty, will take place on the Cal State L.A. campus during the week of February 9 through 13 .
The observance is an official event on the University calendar, proclaimed each year by the President of the University. It provides the opportunity for continuing relationships between the emeriti and the active faculties of the University.
The events which will take place during the weeklong observance are described on page two of this issue of The Emeritimes.
The first day of the week of celebration will mark the observance of the ninth anniversary of the founding of The Emeriti Association. On February 9, 1978, a small group of retired faculty who had been granted emeriti status gathered in the University Faculty Club to establish the

New Directory Lists Record Total of 270 Emeriti Faculty

The new directory of emeriti faculty enclosed with this issue of The Emeritimes lasts a record total of 270 University retirees who have been granted emeritus status. Of the total number of emeriti faculty, 184 are active, dues-paying members of the Emeriti Association.

Association Assigned an Office on Campus

The Emeriti Association has been assigned an office on campus: Room A318 in the Engineering Building.
The office will not be staffed, but messages may be left on the phone recording service by calling (213) 224-2899. Association officers will monitor the calls at least twice weekly and respond to inquires phoned in by members.

sadly in need of organization and development. Since the college had opened in September, 1947, with 136 students, it had grown in two years to over 2,000 students. Most were studying under the GI Bill, which had been largely responsible for establishment of the college. Upper division classes were being taught in borrowed spaces on the City College campus by mostly part-time faculty recruited from other institutions of higher education in the Los Angeles area and any other source where qualified instructors could be found.

When Dr. McDonald retired in 1962, Los Angeles State College of Applied Arts and Sciences, as it became known in 1949, had its own permanent site, on which seven major academic buildings had been built and an eighth structure (North Hall, later named King Hall) was nearing completion. The college had a fulltime faculty of about 700, a student enrollment approaching 16,000 , and an annual graduating class of almost 3,000 bachelor's and master's degree recipients.
During his first year as president, Dr. McDonald put together a small team of administrators to help him build the college. To head this team, he brought in Dr. Albert Graves as Dean of Instruction, to build a permanent teaching faculty and put together an undergraduate and graduate curriculm; Dr. Morton Renshaw as Dean of Student Personnel, to handle admissions and registration; and Dr. Asael Lambert as Executive Dean, to work on finding a site and erecting buildings for a permanent campus for the burgeoning college.
As was his wont, Dr. McDonald kept fully involved in all phases of development of the new college. One of the traits for which he was well known was the dispatch with which he sorted his incoming mail each day and routed it on to others to handle, so that he could get out of his office, and observe at first hand what was going on about the campus. He moved in rapid strides, dropping in offices and even visiting classrooms, putting together his own assessment of what was taking place on his campus.
One of his more difficult tasks, which he enjoyed telling about after the decision was reached, was his search for a campus site. He told of the many sites, somewhere between 27 and 50 , that he checked out. He enjoyed telling how some influential supporters of USC opposed his selection of a piece of land in Baldwin Hills, and how the then Los Angeles Mayor

Poulson ran him out of Chavez Ravine so that he could lure the Dodger baseball team to Los Angeles.

Complicating the selection of the site was a requirement of the State Legislature that the college be located within the city limits of Los Angeles. Finally, the decision was made when a parcel of land owned by the State Highway Department was found on the eastern border of the City of Los Angeles. It was not the best of sites, but it was available and would have to do. Time had run out for the search.
Almost as difficult as finding a permanent site for the College was the task of recruiting 50 to 100 new faculty members every year. The GI Bill helped, as servicemen used their benefits to earn advanced college degrees. Los Angeles State recruited heavily from the graduate schools at USC and UCLA, but the numbers available did not fill their needs. Dr. McDonald took part in faculty recruitment, as he and Dean Graves took trips across the United States to interview prospective faculty members on university campuses.
Another activity in which President McDonald engaged with his usual vigor and determination were trips to Sacramento with Business Manager Jack Heppe and Dean Lambert, to plead the College's needs. There were visits to the State Department of Education, under whose administrative authority the College operated, and to the State Legislature to argue for increased funds for the operating budget and allotments of capital funds for building the new campus. There were many meetings with the State Architect's Office, which was charged by law with the job of designing the College's buildings.
Those 13 years that Dr. McDonald served as president were certainly the formative years of Los Angeles State College. Ever the active, dynamic person, he was faced almost daily with demands for quick decisions which would impact upon the future of the college. Many were not the decisions that he wanted to make, but expediency demanded action. After all, the college was adding 1,000 or more students each year, and there had to be additional faculty and classrooms.
In 13 years Dr. McDonald, aided by his own handpicked team of helpers, had created a college which was attracting nationwide attention as a model of an institution of higher education with a strong urban focus. It was destined to continue to grow and expand academically into university status. Today, California State University, Los Angeles stands as a monument to the dedicated efforts of Howard S. McDonald.

President Meets with Emeriti Officers

Meeting with the Emeriti Association Executive Committee on December 11, President James Rosser gave a strongly upbeat report on the University. He began his remarks with a report on events related to Festival 40, the year-long celebration of the Univeristy's fortieth year. He said a highlight would be a lecture by the noted economist John Kenneth Galbraith on March 16.
His extended remarks on the University covered a wide range of topics, including the following:

- A monument to Confucius, to reflect Asian culture, is to be placed on campus.
- The $$ 1,600,000$ in state lottery money this year will go largely to intructional access to computing.
- Work is being done on development of the University as a cultural center. An Arts Complex is a being planned and the Fine Arts Building is being remodeled.
- The University again has the largest teacher education program in California.
- The Roybal Chair in Gerontology is being established, and there will be a core program in Gerontology.

There is no doubt that the Emeriti Association meets important needs of retired faculty. This general conclusion was supported by the returns of the questionnaire mailed to members in November 1985.
The March 1986 issue of The Emeritimes gave a partial summary of findings. The data suggested that retired faculty are generally well prepared for their transition to retirement and are content in that status. This general conclusion was compatible with the relatively high level of job satisfaction among academics found in other studies.
This second report continues the analysis of the data. Part B asked respondents to rate 11 kinds of mutual aid that retired Cal State faculty might desire (not what each personally desired). Highest ratings were given academic and professional activities associated with their previous roles in the University and lowest ratings were as suggesting that the respondents differed considerably in their conceptions of desired mutual aid which they would like the Association to provide.

These data have implications for planning Assocation activities by taking account of majority views while still making room for the obvious diversity. Perhaps the following does not overdetermine the data: The majority view mutual aid primarily in terms of sharing intellectual interests and matters related to their careers at the University while a substantial minority would like mutual aid to include a broader spectrum of needs relevant to maintaining quality living now and as they age.

Part C of the questionnaire consisted of sentence-stems which the respondents were asked to complete. The first stem was: "The biggest surprise about retirement was . . ." After surveying the completions, they were arranged into psychologically significant

There is plenty of scope for interpretation of these raw data. For instance, it may be that the sample is biased toward recent retirees who presumably are experiencing the exhilaration of a change in life style more than those who retired earlier. Another factor might be the trend toward responding in socially approved ways which are more readily felt and articulated than negative selfreferences. These data combined with the informal remarks of many respondents suggest that only a minority of faculty experience retirement in unexpectedly dysphoric ways.
The data can be regarded as broadly indicative of the mental attitude of faculty as a group rather than as fixed attributes of individuals; to put in differently, as a cross-section of a changing phenomenon. No doubt, if the same respondents reacted to the sentence stems a year earlier or later, some would have given difgiven to more personal matters, such as living arrangments for the later years, stress and coping, and the part-time employment outside the University.

A yes-response to a mutual aid item was assigned a " 1 ", a mayberesponse was assigned a " 2 " and a non-response a " 3 ". Therefore, the higher the mean rating of the mutual aid item, the closer it was to the "no" end of the continuum, signifying that the majority rejected it. The strongest rating of 1.37 was attained by "continuing academic or professional contacts", and the weakest rating of 2.22 was given to "part-time employment outside the University."
While the ratings at the extremes are of course significant for how the majority view the Emeriti Association, the differences among the rank order of ratings of the eleven modes of mutual aid are relatively small. Further, the standard deviations are large. We can interpret all this categories. The responses to this first item were sorted into the following:

Pleasant affect e.g., joyous freedom, relief from daily pressures, more active now, sense of freedom, can experiment as I choose, the easy adjustment, how busy I am, new adventures - $\mathrm{N}=60,45.8 \%$

Neutral affect e.g., how quickly retirement comes, no surprises, haven't noticed any difference, non really - $\mathrm{N}=33,25.2 \%$

Unpleasant affect e.g., can't share mature knowledge, one's anonymity, missing colleagues, feeling an outsider, lack of rapport from non-retired, health problems, empty time was discomfitting, use of time $-\mathrm{N}=20,15.3 \%$

Sample: 131 respondents.
These data suggest that about $71 \%$ considered the transition to retirment either a positive or neutral experience while the other $29 \%$ rated it negatively or found it difficult to respond evaluatively.
ferent responses. Retirement as a career probably has similar undulations of exhilaration and crises of dispair as pre-retirement does. At any rate, the data should be regarded as socially and psychologically relevant even though Emeriti members might see various implications for organizational activities.
In all, there were ten sentence stems which respondents completed. So we can see that much analytic work remains to be done. At least, the data should reveal common concerns among retired faculty with more validity than casual impressions. Since we are sure a diverse group, identifying who we are and what we want from our Association are far from simple issues.
