A MESSAGE FROM THE CHAIR

Christopher Endy, Ph.D. - Chair
LA Department of History

When I moved into the chair's office in August, I found a file cabinet packed with the history of the History Department. Many of the primary sources came in the form of professors' proposals to create new classes.

With these files, I could explore the evolution of our curriculum. When, for instance, did the department replace its bedrock "History of Western Civilization" course with a broader World History survey? The transition started around 1980, the same time a handful of young revolutionaries in Southwest Asia dominated U.S. politics by taking hostages in Iran. When did courses on women's history emerge? That came in 1985, when newly hired professor Carole Srole led the way. More recently, our department files show how we've introduced courses in Digital and Public History, Big History, Mapping Latin America, Piracy in World History, and more.

Speaking of evolution, every three years or so, a new History professor takes a turn as chair. My term started in August, and if all goes well, I'll have five more semesters... and five more newsletters to share.

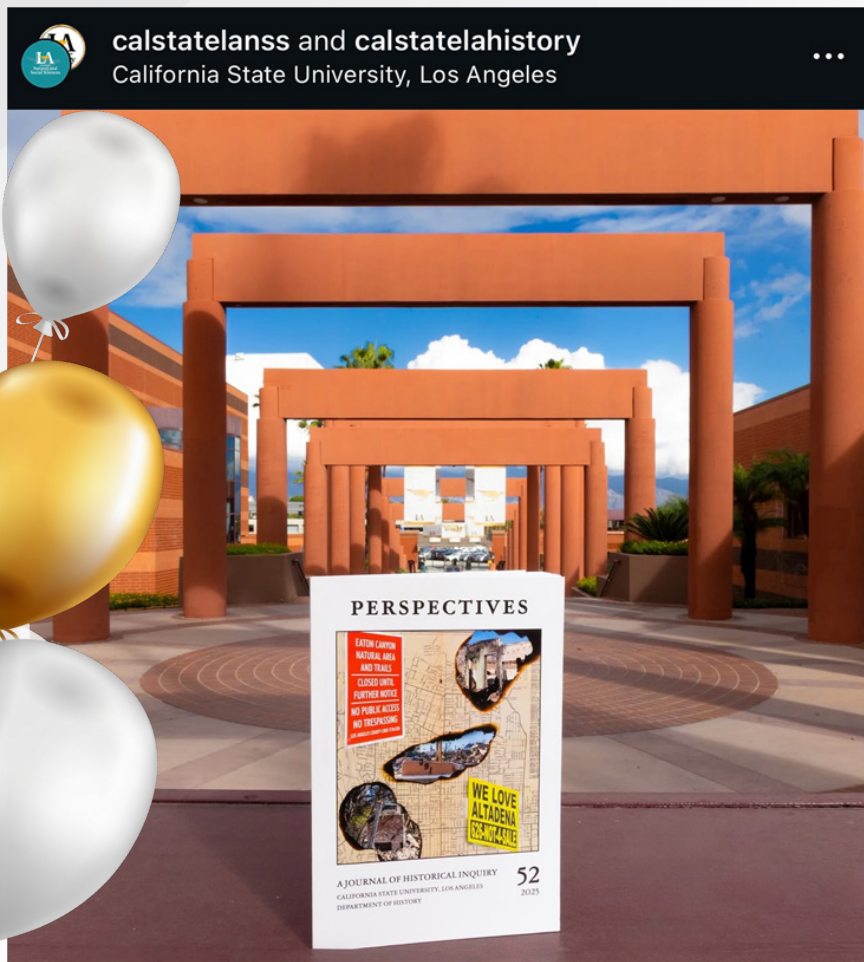

Looking ahead, what projects or ideas should the History Department pursue? This newsletter, put together with the marvelous work of Jocelyne Martinez in our department office, offers a snapshot of where we are now. Over the next few years, please reach out and let me know where you think we should go. What primary sources will we leave for the next generation of historians?

At the turn of the 20th century, the chinchilla was threatened with extinction, leading Latin American conservationists to propose strong and modern public institutions and new laws to protect its habitat. Instead, although the chinchilla survived, it did so through domestication and captive breeding. This trend would be replicated around the world, from the United States to South Africa.

Searching for Dragon's Veins

by Dr. J. Travis Shutz

This summer, I completed a research trip to Taipei and Guangzhou (Canton), capital cities that are home to numerous records and scholars. While acquiring historical texts and recent studies about China's maritime past, the most exciting part was a series of on-site inspections (kaocha 考察) at historically important locations. In June, I visited the Southern Seas Spirit Temple in Guangzhou for the first time since 2014, when I was a recent MA graduate living in the city.

Early accounts place a government station and small shrine on the Fuxu bend of the Pearl River as early as the Sui Dynasty (581-618 CE). Given ambiguities in the records, debate persists about the station's purpose. Was it for border management or tax collection? In other words, did it ensure downriver control over people and goods traveling to and from the upriver capital city? Nevertheless, scholars generally think the shrine's existence reveals Fuxu was a place where seagoers presented offerings for safe voyages.

"The Sea is calm and peaceful" (hai bu bo yi 海不泊溢) stone archway at Southern Seas Spirit Temple, Guangzhou, China

Temple layout in the Southern Seas Spirit Temple Gazetteer (1596)

In my research of Chaozhou (a secondary port city several hundred miles to the east), I grapple with similar cloudiness in historical records. Although China was never cut off from the sea, far more details entered records regarding terrestrial activities. Exploring the temple proved a valuable reintroduction to local Guangzhou history. It also helped me recognize patterns of upstream, downstream, and nearshore connections that have been obscured in Chaozhou records.

Wharf ruins from the Qing Dynasty (1644-1912)

In Guangzhou, a dragon's vein, an important channel of Qi, is believed to run underground from Dragon's Head Mountain southwards beneath Southern Seas Spirit Temple and across the Pearl River. Connections thought to be created by the vein mirror linkages that historians strive to reveal in our research. Like fengshui geomancers recognizing Qi flowing underground made Fuxu a prime location for a shrine, and officials realizing a temple where seagoers stopped was an advantageous position for a government station, we look for unseen and visible forces influencing patterns in the past. So what dragon's veins have you been looking for?

LET'S HEAR FROM OUR CURRENT STUDENTS!

What is it like being a history student at Cal State LA?

Nathaniel Jaco-Razon, B.A. student

Being a history student at CSULA is incredibly rewarding, as we produce work that feels meaningful and actually contributes to our understanding of history.

Michael Machado, M.A. student

It is a heck of a lot of reading and writing, but mostly a lot of reading. My leisure hours after work are now spent reading and taking notes on what I read.

Ezra Alvarez, B.A. student

At first, I had difficulty staying with one major and decided that history should be the most interesting for me at the time. I do like history and learning about some of the events I did not know happened which has shaped our world. However, I do think people overestimate it since there is a lot of reading, but it is an important role, and many more people should consider the lessons behind it.

Juana Evink, M.A. student

Being a student at Cal State LA, is great, all the professors are extremely helpful, knowledgeable and qualify.

LET'S HEAR FROM OUR CURRENT STUDENTS!

What has been your favorite history course so far and why?

Nathaniel Jaco-Razon, B.A. student

My favorite history courses have been HIST 4890 History of Los Angeles and 3450 Rise of Urban America, both for the same reason. These courses really developed my understanding of living in a major city, and the history of both success and oppression made Los Angeles.

Michael Machado, M.A. student

History 5750 with Dr. Chris Endy has been my favorite course so far for, I liked the selection of books that we read touching upon US transnational history. Also, I liked how Endy ran the class because it forced me to do things that seemed insane like reading a book a week. The bookends method has really helped with tackling that.

Ezra Alvarez, B.A. student

My favorite courses have been ancient history so far because they were simple classes that were relatively easy to understand.

Juana Evink, M.A. student

My favorite history course so far was Professor Doran's Ancient Greek seminar. Despite being a challenging class, the topic and the group assignments made it so much more interesting and manageable.

LET'S HEAR FROM OUR CURRENT STUDENTS!

What kind of change would you like to see at Cal State LA?

Nathaniel Jaco-Razon, B.A. student

One change I would like to see at CSULA is the improved design of GET and greater accessibility to History Department courses. Another change I would recommend is the implementation of a King Taco or Tommy's Original Burger as one of the on-campus dining services. Both restaurants are iconic Los Angeles food eateries and should be represented at LA's iconic Cal State.

Michael Machado, M.A. student

How about cheaper parking. Especially if you're a grad student going twice a week. It should not be more than $100 for a semester, maybe make it valid from 5-9pm or something.

Ezra Alvarez, B.A. student

I would like to see additional events at school other than holiday celebrations throughout the months. Given that CSULA is a commuter school, the culture tends to reflect a similar notion. I also liked that the History department hosted a few Dodgers games. In general, I would want to see similar activities being presented at school.

Juana Evink, M.A. student

I would like more courses on ancient world history and medieval being offered every semester. As well as more classes in order for students to have options.

LET'S HEAR FROM OUR CURRENT STUDENTS!

What is your favorite thing about
Cal State LA?

Nathaniel Jaco-Razon, B.A. student

My favorite thing about CSULA is the professors; almost all of my professors have been incredible at teaching and getting me to connect with the material to have a better understanding of it. The professors are also very easy to talk to about any difficulty you are having with learning the material and will be able to provide the additional support you need. It is very easy to tell that every professor in the history department has a genuine passion for the subject and for their students.

Michael Machado, M.A. student

My favorite thing about Cal State LA is its accessibility, for it provides easy access to higher education for thousands of LA and adjacent residents. As a high school teacher in south central LA I love that CSULA is just a 20 minute drive away and it's affordable enough where I do not need to take out loans for my graduate courses. The hours for graduate courses are also great for fitting into my schedule. Lastly, CSULA has some nice views.

Ezra Alvarez, B.A. student

I originally chose CSULA because it was really close to home and a step up from community college. I think many students like me also enrolled into CSULA because it is local and a commuter school which makes it easier on my responsibilities outside of school.

Juana Evink, M.A. student

My favorite thing about Cal State LA is the outstanding professors and seminar classes being offered at night.

LET'S HEAR FROM OUR CURRENT STUDENTS!

Share with us an accomplishment or update

Nathaniel Jaco-Razon, B.A. student

One update I have is that after this semester I will have completed my CLS minor and only need two more History courses (and three electives) to graduate and receive my B.A.

Ezra Alvarez, B.A. student

Balancing life and school can be difficult tasks. Especially when class assignments pile on which can be overwhelming. However, being consistent and completing assignments despite separate challenges provide a progress to look back on and realize how rewarding it can be.

Juana Evink, M.A. student

My accomplishment so far is to be able to take, complete, and pass two courses a semester while being a middle school teacher, and a mother of three small children. Furthermore, that despite the challenges, I haven't given up yet.
